Mr Salmond was expected to tell MSPs the SNP had already implemented many of its manifesto pledges from last year's election and is well on the way to implementing others.

And among the new measures he was due to outline were an increase in the amount of government information that is put into the public domain.

He was expected to announce a pilot programme for the pro-active publication of more information, arguing that openness and transparency means more than responding to freedom of information requests. This should bring some squeals from Wendy and her cohorts!
